The volume which Mrs. Shows will same at the assailants in the Byron controversy on Wednesday next, fills four hundred and cightly-two pages duodecimo. Dundred and cightly-two pages duodecimo. Dundred will probably differ as greatly after the persus of this work as before. The only direct proof which she brings, perhaps the only proof that can possibly be adduced, is Lady Byron's own statement, which is here given in Fall. She brings to bear quite a mass of cumulative evidence, but much of it, if not all, has been used before, and its value has been weighted in the numberless articles that have been written on the subject since the publication of her article in the Atlantic Mostally. "We Americans have been made accessories, after the fact, to overy insult and injury that Lord Brayest upon Lady Byron. We have been betterwed into injustices and a complicity with villainy. What was the consequence in American My attention was first called to the result, not by reading the Blackwood article, but by finding in a popular monthly magazine two long articles—the one an enthusiantic recommendation of the Guiceloih book, and the other a lampitation over the burning of the antobiography as a cold, malignant, mean, persecuting woman, who had been her husband's ruin. They were to full of falsehoods and missistements as to astonish me. He acts through life exactly like a man strungling with remorse and straid of detection; he has all the restlessness and harter dad fear that a man has who feels that there is evidence which might destroy him.
